

Trimmed, clipped and angry with urgency.... Strummer looks up again

Pic: Peter Anderson

LIVE!

THE CLASH

Fair Deal

A GESTURE of fate, surely, that the weekend after five greying businessmen had played a ghostly entertainment to their thoughtless disciples should showcase the group long established as favourite pretenders to the throne their elders must one day vacate.

At the career point which The Clash now find themselves, The Rolling Stones had already floundered through 'Their Satanic Majesties' and were mired in indecision. Popular music moves even faster now — after all, The Clash have already recorded their 'Exile On Main Street' in 'Sandinista!' — and although The Stones have now effectively stopped time to suit their stasis (the Gods we make of men!), The Clash have moved this year as if time really is running out, for them and us.

That feeling of urgency, a sense that every step skipped could count against you, ran through their long-awaited show at Brixton's Fair Deal like kerosene from a ruptured gas pump (to be suitably American for a moment). Every one of perhaps 20 songs was dealt out with a surly, scorched-earth bravado, spilling accents of suspicion and untempered wrath: purpose in every turn.

Naturally, this kind of slam-bang assault can easily wear out into thunderous monotony after a while, and I waited for that particular clampdown to inevitably arrive. The reason why it never actually did, explains how this group have affected such a brilliant revitalisation. What The Clash have done is familiar enough to most groups facing up to a mid-life menopause: re-examine their beginnings and climb a different path back. In a steaming 'Career Opportunities' that made the frustration of all the previous versions seem timorous, it was obvious how seriously The Clash had returned to their first strengths, trimming the deadwood of funky philandering on the bleaker spots of 'Sandinista!'. But rather than simply discovering that first blast all over again (which is impossible anyway), The Clash have reinvented their roots.

THREE CONVICTIONS ON THE ROAD FROM HELL

Everything has been reduced to an insignia. The Clash's rock'n'roll is primordial not in the way of rockabilly (because they never ever swing like rockabilly does and on the supercharged ignition of 'Brand New Cadillac' traditional rock'n'roll is moonshot, not revved-up), but in the blunt anger of the simplest figure or rhythm hammered on a line of deadeye consistency. The Clash have learnt to channel sound as never before.

What the bungling theatre of sores that now calls itself British punk cannot grasp is this definition. Most of them could again learn from a group they now presumably laugh at: the sound of punk shouldn't be the spluttery sprawl of mud-clogged feedback over Chad Valley drums, it should be this steeled rush, this fluorescent razor's edge!

'Know Your Rights', one of the year's great singles, is central to this. The Clash strip the form of a song down until all you hear is that unyielding guitar line — no more than a rhythm, like an agitated heartbeat — and the raging showmanship of Joe Strummer's roar: a marriage of fanatical directness and a rhetorician's fury.

Except Strummer has no truck with rhetoric. The Clash line up with the same bald intensity as the rock they're playing. They are themselves reduced to line drawings: Jones' skill-featured stare, eyeballs forever about to flip backwards in their sockets, Strummer's mohican, Simonon's cliff-browed insolence. They perform before a backdrop of slides of the most simplistic political symbolism — Thatcher, Vietnam, Carol Ann Kelly's gravestone — and you're checked on the sneer in the realisation that they've forged a link between this everyman posturing and the music they're playing which does, at last, strike a fundamental humanitarian note.

Minus the distracting concessions to pop or a spurious bastardisation of 'disco', The Clash have rediscovered something that rock is supposed to have forgotten: its grip on exhilaration — its reactivation of concern. They have refused to institutionalise themselves. Of course 'rock' can't change anything — but if music can burst a slumber — if music could talk . . .

They still have their weaknesses, of course. A song like 'White Man In The Hammersmith Palais' has outlived its useful life, overstuffed with words and bereft of proper dynamics; Simonon's lugubrious thick-ear vocals tarnish an otherwise riveting 'Guns Of Brixton'; and Jones' voice (despite his curiously affecting whisper on the signature to 'Stay Free') will never be up to much.

It is all overcome by Strummer's breathtaking conviction. If he faltered for a moment, the card house which any rock music is built of would fall in at once. Perhaps his greatest test comes on 'Magnificent Seven': to turn the rambling prototype of the studio version into something comparable to the surrounding inferno of 'Janie Jones' and 'Police On My Back'. It turns out a consummate acquittal.

The most persistent memory is of Strummer, two fingers pressed against his face, eyes half-closed in concentration, taking the hardest course through 'Armageddon Time'. I say we need this anger, no matter how romantic it may be. I say this antidote to romantic despair is necessary.

The Greatest Rock'n'Roll Band In The World. I guess that doesn't sit so badly, after all . . .

Richard Cook

LIAISONS DANGEREUSES THE ARCTIC BROTHERS

Glasgow

It'll take a while yet before Liaisons Dangereuses have the reputation to pack Night Moves on a miserable wet Monday night, but the handful that did turn out seemed actually interested . . .

The Arctic Brothers made a reasonably brave, if somewhat uninspired attempt at breaking the ice: but what for an instance appeared to be a faint glimmer of comprehension was altogether destroyed by a sound vaguely resembling The Tubes on valium, thrashing out unmentionable fifth-rate trash rock, and threatening at times to tumble into 'My Sharona'.

Their reception frosted around the time they tried to sing The Carpenters' 'Close To You', and I got lost in a conversation attempting to define the typical D.A.F. fan; but that didn't take long (and he was in the dressing-room later anyway) and I wandered over to the bar as the Arctic Brothers encored with an unorthodox 'Vicious' before being hauled off-stage. Their performance had just the wrong amount of everything — or was that wholly deliberate?

Daniel Miller's new babies — who might appear at times to be a terrifying mutation and in stark contrast to the straightforwardly melodic approach to Depeche Mode — assume an immediate quiet command as they swirl and sway through a variety of elating numbers, holding their tiny audience close and intent almost right to the end. It would of course be all too easy (and hugely ignorant) to dismiss them because they're cold and foreign — and it's a pretty safe assumption that the multi-linguistics are wholly lost on their average audience — and unfamiliar. They may be unknown, but not empty: shadowy but not shallow.

With the electronics at times seeming to defy any sort of acceptable dance beat, the singer thrusts and weaves, hot and cold: his staccato movements often matching his vocals, as he in turn lifts and casts off wandering melodies over relentless rhythms; compelling and sometimes thrilling, and rarely predictable.

Their early D.A.F. associations (which will work in their favour for the present) will not be an issue of future confusion . . .

Liaisons Dangereuses seem clear and firm in their aims — which they certainly need to be, in a climate where audiences still warm more readily to laughing guitars or brass gone mad (a tendency which is fast becoming profitable in the tame form) than to a stack of machines.

The frenzy of tapes is less acceptable here without bland commerciality — or powerful visuals. So while the Human League are truly modern and international, Liaisons Dangereuses are truly modern but still rather inaccessible. Anyway, I was trying not so much to like them, as not to dislike them: and they won effortlessly.

A temporary lack of fire there may have been, but their basics are impeccably intact.

Kirsty McNeill